Section 1: Moms Guide to Buying a Computer – What Do You Really Need?

The old family computer never did recover from that virus attack, and it's finally given up the ghost. You took it to the electronics store where you bought it, and they tell you it's not fixable – the co-processor is fried.

Persuasively, they try to interest you in a new system, and show you some deals – but they're all either over your budget or you just aren't sure if you need all that stuff!

You tell them you'll think about it – and rush to the net, to look up what you need. (You were thinking of switching to a Mac, anyway...)

Pretty soon, you're lost in a sea of specs. You really don't care if the new computer has all the techno-loaded bells and whistles – you just want one that won't be so slow, and will handle the kids' computer games, all those endless videos they like to watch – and your business software.

You try to find some no nonsense tips on buying the best computer for your needs.

And that's why you're here.

Your Own Personal Computer Specs

The first thing you need to do, before you look up any more online specs, is use the little Computer Brainstorming Sheet, below...

TIP: Use PENCIL – so you can erase, if you change your mind about any section, after finding out new facts...

Computer Brainstorming Sheet
What will it be used for?
What's your budget?
How will you pay for it?
Who will use it? Shared, or single user?
Where will you put it?
What peripherals, accessories or furniture will you need?
Laptop or PC? Mac or PC?

That's just to get you started, so don't be afraid of changing your mind. After we've done some research and you've had a chance to absorb new facts, there will be some worksheets later in this Special Report too.

So let's have a look at the answers to some of these questions... and some tips on how to decide what's right for you.

What Will It Be Used For?

Do you need it just for emails and word processing? Are you a graphic designer? Do you like making videos, or do you have to access a lot of them for research or work at home?

Will your children need to share the computer? Your husband? What are their interests and needs?

Let's write them all down...
